Abstract—The purpose of this study was to determine if there were differences in the prevalence of musculoskeletal disorders among different types of workers. The study included 600 male employees from a large manufacturing company who had been employed for at least one year. Data were collected through a self-administered questionnaire that asked about various factors related to work and health. The results showed that the prevalence of musculoskeletal disorders was higher among workers in certain job categories compared to others. Specifically, workers in jobs involving heavy lifting or repetitive motions reported higher rates of back pain, neck pain, and wrist/hand problems. These findings suggest that job design and workplace ergonomics may play a significant role in the development of musculoskeletal disorders.
